Cal EOC Incident – 2014 Drought

- SOC / Inland REOC remains activated in support of 2014 Drought

Weather of Concern

- Fire Weather Watch / Red Flag Warnings from Friday afternoon through Sunday evening for dry thunderstorms for portions of Northern California.
- Excessive Heat Warning in effect until 2100 hours on 6/26/15 for Inyo and Mono counties.

Active Weather Warnings, Watches and Advisories by County: http://www.wrh.noaa.gov/sto/brief/www_bc_cal.php

Northern Region

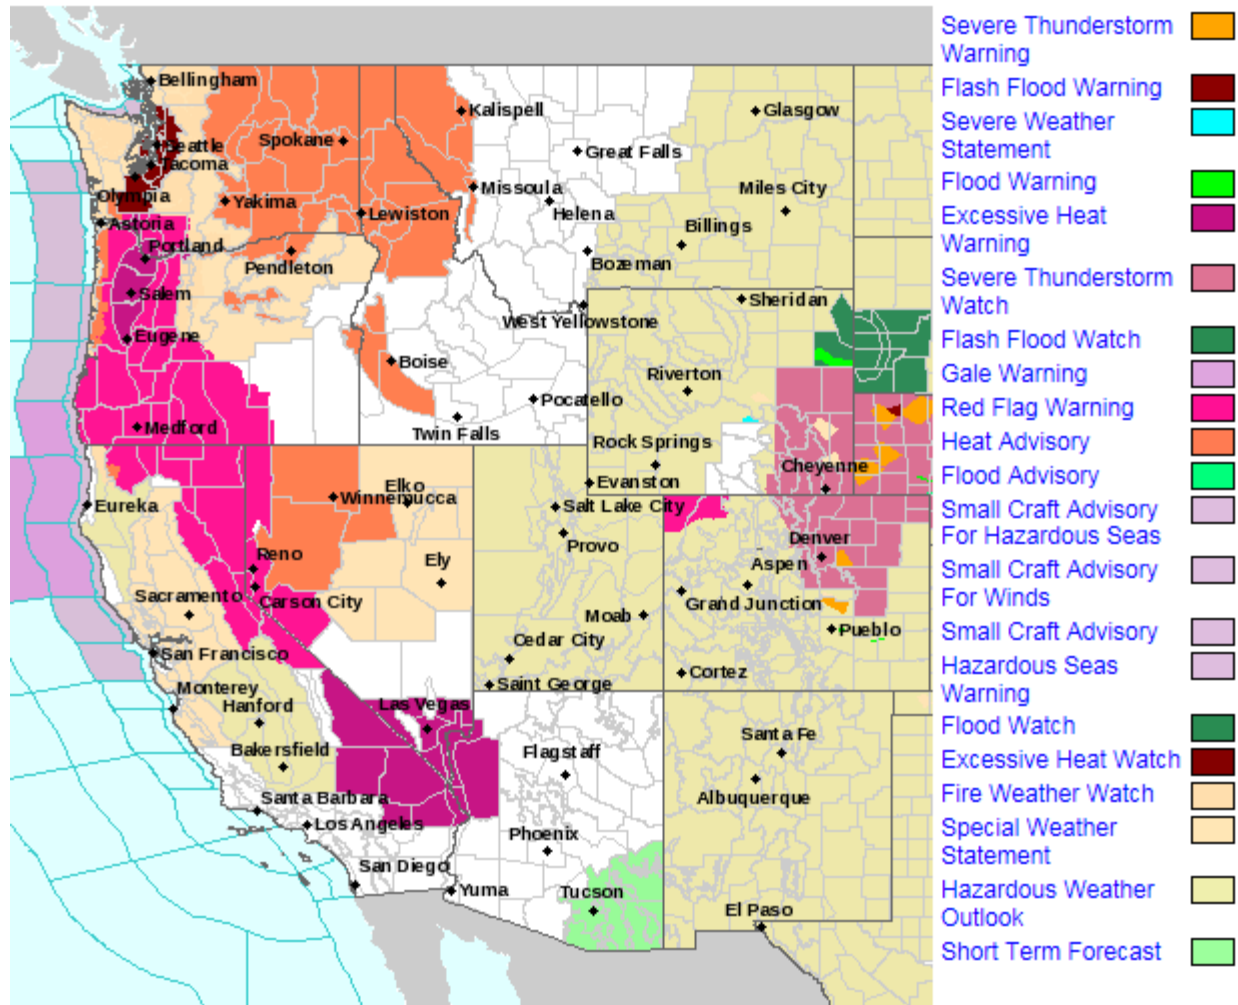

Strong high pressure aloft will be expanding northwestward over Nevada today, which will bring both increased Northern Operations heat and a southeast to south flow aloft by tonight. That flow pattern will bring increased higher level moisture and a decreasing trend in air mass stability starting later today, but especially so into Northern Operations on Friday. Isolated afternoon and evening mostly dry thunderstorms are now expected to affect three Predictive Service Areas starting by late afternoon or early evening Friday (Northern Sierra, Northeast California, and Northwestern Mountains). Isolated strike areas could continue overnight Friday, and Saturday looks active in much of the north and eastern sections. Sunday's activity may be more confined to far northern and eastern Northern California, while also seeing more of a mix of dry to marginally wet cells. Large/Significant Fire Potential has been elevated to HIGH RISK in 3 Predictive Service Areas by late Friday, and then left in 4 of them over the weekend. Daily lightning chances continue well into next week, with a general trend of more wetness to the strike-producing cells with time. There are no significant large-area gradient winds to be concerned with in the next few days, but strong and erratic thunderstorm downdraft winds often gust to a 35-55 mph range for 5-25 minute periods! The sharp warming trend continues today, with the hottest low inland valleys generally in a 108-114 degree range the next 2-3 days. Minimum relative humidity patterns are generally low today and Friday for interior areas, but they should show at least minor rising trends over the weekend, especially in the east.

Southern Region

A ridge of high pressure over the Great Basin, along with an offshore trough, will steer moisture into the area beginning Friday. However, today, skies will remain mostly sunny and temperatures will be a few degrees above normal. A slight deepening of the marine layer will allow for some cooling near the coast, but overall temperatures will remain in the 70s along the coast and in the upper elevations of the mountains to the 90s in the valleys and lower foothills. Relative humidity this afternoon will range from 8-12% along areas adjacent the desert, but most other areas will see readings in the teens this afternoon. Friday, the first wave of mid and higher level moisture will reach the Sierras, resulting in scattered showers and isolated thunderstorms. These storms should remain near the Crest and will dissipate after sunset. Saturday, additional moisture may reach the southern part of the State. A handful of thunderstorms will be possible near the higher terrain of Southern California, mainly east and south of Los Angeles County. Isolated showers and storms will continue in the Sierras. The best chance of dry thunderstorms appears to be Sunday when additional mid and high level moisture arrives. Scattered dry storms will be possible from the Sierras southward to most of the mountains of Southern California. The storms will be few in numbers Friday and Saturday, but should be more widespread on Sunday. Therefore, a High Risk Day continues for the Sierras, the Sierra Foothills, the Inyo National Forest and most of the mountains of Southern California, including the Angeles, San Bernardino and Cleveland National Forest. Gusty, erratic winds, but little rain will result from the storms. Due to the recent hot, dry weather, dead fuel moisture has slipped back toward record low readings and fuels will be highly receptive to ignition this weekend. High temperatures will remain about the same over the weekend. Early next week, moisture in the low levels should increase, allowing storms to transition from dry to wet. Brief heavy rain will be possible from the storms Monday and Tuesday. The active thunderstorm pattern may continue most of next week along with hot temperatures.
